ALAMAU CONFERENCE IN SOUTH AFRICA

The African Leadership Academy's Model United Nations was by far the highlight of my academic year. Having stressed poor Ms. Walugembe with the never ending documents we needed to have to get to Johannesburg, when we finally arrived it felt surreal.

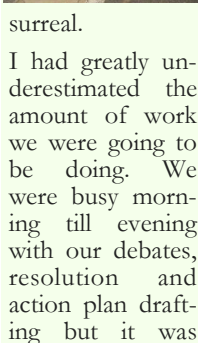

I had greatly underestimated the amount of work we were going to be doing. We were busy morning till evening with our debates, resolution and action plan drafting but it was such fun (most of the time) that time just seemed to fly. The committees weren't in huge, daunting halls which made it so much easier for you to converse and it greatly boosted my confidence and public speaking skills. There was also a sense of friendly rivalry between committees that resulted in a lot of raids and chants from committees trying to one up each other.

My favourite bit was my committee (The Social Affairs and Health) which was filled with such interesting people from all over Africa. Meeting people with such different backgrounds; teaches you so much more than what you can learn in a classroom and the knowledge that you're forced to learn for your committee opens your eyes to problems you may not have been aware of before and how the steps taken to solve these problems are never simple.

What I liked the least was perhaps the fact we had to leave. That and the long lines for food.

If I had a chance to go again, I would take it in a heartbeat. The experience is one that you can't quite find anywhere else. You develop problem solving skills as you really need to think hard to find effective, plausible solutions to some of Africa's problems. You build confidence, and for anyone who wants a future in leadership you leave with a general idea of what it takes, and given the fact you've already taken a step towards being a future leader; you leave with a sense of determination, and confidence in your abilities as a delegate.
